The game's movement and ball physics were specifically tuned to feature technology. In addition to the normal, low-resolution camera, the game is able to track the player positions by using three high-resolution cameras, allowing the development team to capture more accurate and more detailed movement. This technology has allowed the development team to include "hyper motion" in the player actions and animations that were not possible before. The system collects data during a match, going through every goal that is scored, and replay that data during a match simulation. For example, it captures the path of every shot or the pass that is played as opposed to a fixed, camera view from a fixed point in the stadium. It also tracks the timing of the movement, sprint, acceleration, turning and other key data to execute player models. This allows the game to be more responsive to player skills. Whenever a player performs a special move, the system records the data and then replays those movements in game simulation. For example, if a player performs an overhead kick, the system will use the data from the motion capture suit and map that data to different movements. As the player kicks the ball, the motion is recorded, processed and then translated into the player's model. "The systems we have now, although interesting, are very limited," Lazaridis said. "The only way we could have a closer look was to go to a motion capture suit or our own motion capture suit. The most important thing is we are now able to be totally free in how to model our game. We can be a bit more creative and pull in other sources of data where we may not have had that luxury." Re-Mapping the FreeKick The development team used the players' recording data to model a new freekick system which makes it easier for players to take free kicks and dummies. The system builds on FIFA 16's new freekick system and makes it more realistic and playable. The new system would make the freekick more challenging. Players will have to think more while preparing and taking the kick. The simulation will show players the trajectory of the freekick when a player kicks it, and will then tell the player whether the ball has landed well or not. When players return to the penalty area, the system will remind them of the direction the ball was shot at. This would mean the players must readjust their
